I am trying to study light scattered in the soft tissue of the body, but I am not sure how I can trace the path of the scattered light. For example, if I take a photo of an object by shining some light on it, and then I shine light of a different wavelength on the object, I can see the difference in the image, but I do not know how to interpret this information. I am trying to understand what different parts of the body do when a photon of a certain wavelength is scattered by the body. A: A general comment is that there is always some absorption of the incident light and then emission of the scattered light, because the scattering is not 100% efficient. The work in x-ray scattering by photons in a human breast is that the scattering is increased by vessels at the surface of the skin, and multiple scattering by the breast with fat also
